YOUNG MAN WITH A MESSAGE

Jack Moran waited impatiently as the passenger train slowly moved into the terminal, chugging along at its own pace. Within a minute, his big-city cousin, Lloyd Mallan, would descend from one of the cars to spend a week with the Moran family.

Jack hadn't seen Lloyd for years, but he'd heard big things about him — Lloyd was of a musical bent, had even played piano and clarinet summers with some big name bands and knew lots about outfits such as Ray Anthony's, Stan Kenton's, Sauter and Finnegans and others.

Lloyd would be a cousin in the know, Jack thought, who would finally be able to tell Anne Galloway the real scoop about the good things in jazz. Anne was a long-hair type (but wavy long hair) who thought bop was a noise made when you got a hit in the head. Anne had lately been real cool (in a distant sort of way) toward Jack because of his lack of interest in things like chamber music and opera. "But now," thought Jack, "my cuz will straighten her out." And at that moment a shout from a car-ladder caught Jack's ear.

"Hey, Jackson. Your cool cousin is blowing over this way, man. Give me some skin!"

Jack trotted over and shook hands warmly with his long-time-no-see kinfolk. "How've you been, Lloyd, it's been a long time."

"Yeah, gate," responded Lloyd exuberantly, "many a mixed-up moon has crept past the pad since I laid the glims on you. But, can the Lloyd handle. They call me 'Illinois' now, 'cause I blow the most horn in Chi, the windy city, you know. Buzz me on what's new with you, boy!"

"The family's all fine, Llo-er, Illinois, and are waiting at home to welcome you — uh — what did you say before?"

"Oh, well, man, I'd better stick to basic English in this town. What I meant to say was a lot of time has passed since I saw you last, and what's new now, anyhow?"

It was evident that Lloyd, who shall hereafter be referred to as Illinois, was trying hard to get into basic English, but his basic rhythm kept him bouncing through life. As Jack picked up Illinois' luggage, including a clarinet and a sax case, and helped him with it to the car, he was thinking deeply . . . Later tonight he had a date with Anne — he'd take Illinois along and see if that action would help dispel Anne's dislike for jazz. Perhaps Illinois could explain to her about jazz.

Jack's whole gang were jazz fans, complete with record collections and old copies of Downbeat; but lately the girl friends, led by Anne, had all gone in for long-hair stuff. Illinois knew enough of the technical aspects of music to parlez-vous on an intelligent plane with the girls and perhaps sell them on jazz music — and consequently sell them back on their boy friends.

Anyhow, thought Jack, as he and Illinois approached the family front door, he'll be able to sell the girls on jazz if anyone could — if anyone could understand him, that is.

"Mello-rooney! This is a real fine pile of timbers you call your domicile. I imagine you cats keep cool and happy here," was the response Illinois made upon meeting the folks. The folks took to Illinois almost immediately, but were at a loss as to the nature of his conversation the best part of the evening. Jack noticed his father looking over the edge of his waterglass at Illinois rather sharply a couple of times, and Jack's mother simply agreed with everything he said, since she obviously didn't understand a word of the bop talk Illinois dispensed.

Later, Jack took a drive to Anne's house with Illinois in tow. "You see, Illinois," he said as they drove, "the gang and I are great jazz fans, and we buy all the records and know what's going on in the field — but Anne, well, she plays piano and she doesn't think jazz ranks with classical music at all. In fact she thinks very little of people who dol I'm counting on you to straighten her out for me."

"How so, Jackson?" asked Illinois.

"Well," said Jack, "maybe by explaining in musician-to-musician talk that jazz is worth listening to. If she gets convinced, she'll convince the rest of the women, and all the guys can start breathing easier again and go back to Basie instead of long stretches of Bach — not that I have anything against Bach."

"No, man, you shouldn't have anything against Bach — I've stolen some sweet riffs from that man's notes," said Illinois.

"You mean you're familiar with the classics? You think there's something to them?" asked Jack.

"Is there? Why man, you ain't lived till you've caught a blast of DeBussy's 'La Mer' or Ravel's 'Bolero!' Rachmaninoff, Bartok, Schubert — they're deep because they've been dug, man! That Bartok can really talk!"

Jack made a mental note to catch a number of these composers mentioned. If Illinois caught some frantic rhythms from them, there must be something to them.

The dulcet notes of Chopin's "Polonaise" wafted their way out to them as Jack parked the car in front of Anne's house. That was Anne playing, he thought. Jack was more than pleased at the way things were going now. Illinois was familiar enough with classical music to keep on a conversational level with Anne and perhaps convince her of the sweet things to be had in listening to jazz.

"How do you do," Anne greeted Illinois on being introduced.

"Righteous, little one, righteous. I dug the 'Polonaise' as we were coming up the drag. I had a fine experience one summer night in Chi putting that one down in a boogie beat!"

Anne, while not hep to the jive talk, did get his meaning and appreciated a bit of interest in music ala classical. She maintained the conversation on the same plane. Jack later excused himself, and, as he left the porch (ostensibly to bring the car back to his father for a short period before he came back for Illinois and more conversation), he and Illinois exchanged private and broad winks indicating that the situation was well under control.

As Jack drove away, it seemed to him he heard the "Polonaise" coming forth from the Galloway household in boogie tempo, and he whispered to himself and the DeSoto, "Fast worker, Illinois, fast worker."

Jack knew the Record Emporium was open 'til nine and decided to check into some of the records and composers Illinois had mentioned earlier in the evening. Asking for a classical record was a new experience for Jack, but he found a few of the jazz gang in the Emporium who would help him share it. They listened to Bartok and Schubert and Ravel and DeBussy and even dug some Beethoven (but didn't get to Bach) that evening.

Jack headed back to pick up Illinois after he left the Record Emporium with an album of DeBussy's on the seat beside him. He was hoping for the best as he pulled up in front of Anne's, and he heard it.

It was the unmistakable sound of eight-to-the-bar piano music — and he was moderately surprised that Illinois would still be playing. He was thinking his cousin must have really sold Anne on jazz — and he must also have sold the family, unless they were away for the evening.

The piano beat didn't stop when he rang the bell, so, carrying the DeBussy album, he walked into the house so as not to disturb the playing any further. He looked for Illinois' wiry frame bent over the piano keyboard, but instead saw Anne at the piano with Illinois standing behind her clapping his hands in beat to the music. "Get it, Annie! Go, girl, go!" And she was going! Solid! The music suddenly stopped as Anne looked up from the keyboard and saw Jack standing there holding the album of DeBussy's "La Mer." She was startled as he was, if not more so.

"Why, Jack —"

"Why, Anne —"

"Why, gates, let's all get together on this music kick, check?"

"Illinois was just letting me try an arrangement he had made of a Bach Chorale. He had done it in boogie rhythm — musically. It's quite unique, you know," she went on, as Jack stood there staring dumbly. "But what's that you have there, Jack? Don't tell me you're going in for classical music?"

"Well," Jack said in a trapped-animal fashion, "after Illinois gave the classics such a build-up, there was nothing to do but go check into it. He was right, I guess. This album of 'La Mer' is something more than terrific — you can actually hear the sound of the sea in it. What music!"

At this remark, a trace of a smile crossed Anne's face; then it spread to a grin on Jack's face. It broke into laughter when it got around to Illinois — and soon it became contagious. They all laughed long, loud and comfortably. They had discovered a universal secret, a secret that is secret only until someone realizes the simplicity of it — that no art is long-hair or short-hair.

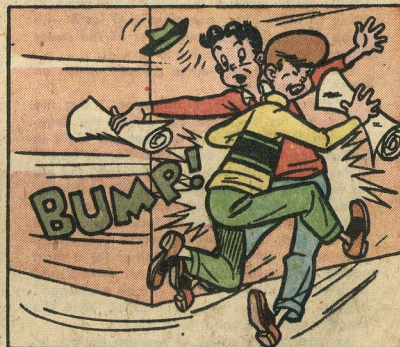

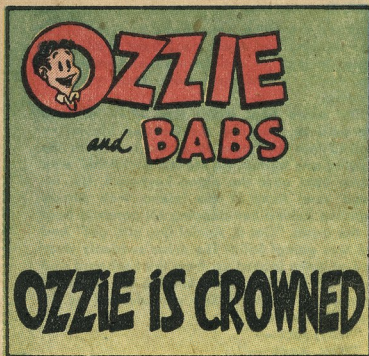

As Illinois said on his way back to Chicago to the guys and dolls who had assembled to see him off:

"It's all notes, Gates, all notes. Dust off those written way-back-when once in a while, and you'll find lots of good sounds. But don't forget Satchmo either!"

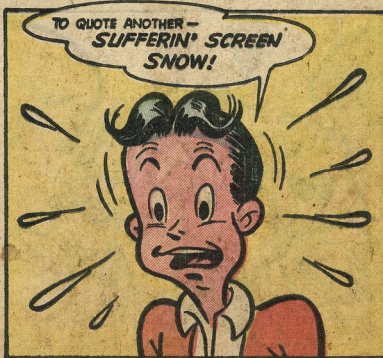

And they don't. Since Illinois hit town and left it rocking, the Swing-Gates and their long-hair girl friends (well, girls are supposed to have long hair) may be heard on a Saturday night cutting a rug one minute and sitting with chin in hand the next digging some Bartok.

As Jack says, "I like it! It provides time out for resting!"

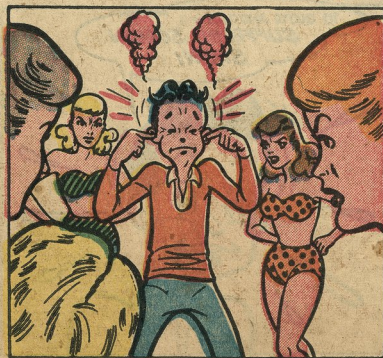

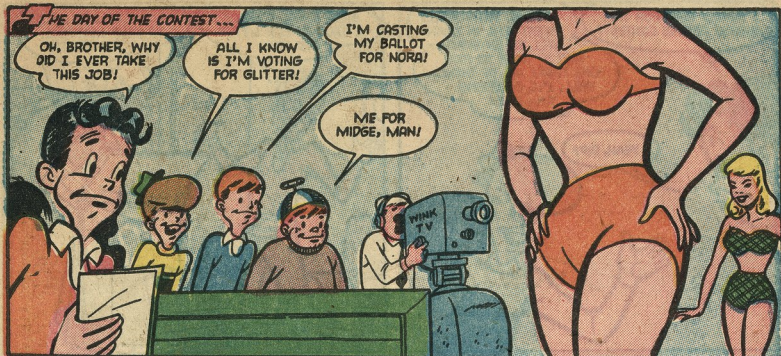

"And romance!" Anne adds, as if she'd planned it that way all along.
